The American Dream by Edward Albee: Mommy and Daddy are waiting impatiently for someone, but they’re a bit vague on just who exactly that someone might be and why they’re coming. Mrs. Barker, who runs the Bye-Bye Adoption Service, doesn’t quite seem to understand why she’s there either. Only Grandma knows, but she’s not telling. When a mysterious and handsome young man comes on the scene, the family’s gruesome and violent past is uncovered, and the true fallout of the American Dream is revealed in all its grotesque and terrifying absurdity.

The Happy Journey to Trenton and Camden by Thornton Wilder: Meet the Kirbys: Ma, Pa, and their two children, Arthur and Caroline. They take a road trip from their home in Newark down to Camden to visit their eldest daughter, Beulah, who has recently suffered a miscarriage. They wave goodbye to their neighbors, they watch a funeral procession, they pick flowers, they stop for hot dogs; nothing happens, everything happens.

Presented together, these two one-act plays portray starkly contrasting snapshots of American life: its generosity and its cruelty, its simplicity and its heartlessness, its sanctity and its madness.
