Dying is something humanity has wrestled with since the beginning of civilization. It is a journey all must take. However, each one of us decides how and when we take this journey. Is Life part of the preparation for the journey? Some say life on earth is only but a moment in the soul’s existence. Others believe there is time enough on our deathbed for reconciliation between what we know is coming and what we will leave behind.

Branden Jacobs-Jenkins brings us this important adaptation of the morality play Everyman. In it, he addresses the richness and complexity of contemporary humanity and redefines who Everybody is. Powerful work, still, I feel the storytelling is that of a western morality play. So, for our process, I let the inspiration of the Aztec myths of creation lead me to some choices, both in the way we worked in the rehearsal room with our fantastic cast and crew, and the selection of the work to be presented in the Danse Macabre, a three-minute interlude granted by Jacobs-Jenkins to interpret what happens to us when we die. There is no Camille Saint-Saens, no Swedish rock band, nor our famous José Guadalupe Posada’s Calaveras. I attempted to take us into the myth behind the Day of the Dead celebration, the journey to Mictlán. A journey that takes four years to complete. To this day believers gather in families to pray the Rosario regularly for four years, thus helping their loved ones on their journey. The four-year journey comprises of nine stages, each of which prepares the soul to release all that keeps us attached to this world. It is a rugged journey but once completed, Souls are forever joined with the essence of the universe. I share with you a poem in Spanish by Nezahualcóyotl, originally written in Nahuatl.

Yo Nezahualcóyotl lo pregunto:
¿Acaso de veras se vive con raíz en la tierra?
Nada es para siempre en la tierra:
Sólo un poco aquí.
Aunque sea de jade se quiebra,
Aunque sea de oro se rompe,
Aunque sea plumaje de quetzal se desgarra.
No para siempre en la tierra:
Sólo un poco aquí.

Forever thankful to the amazing designers and crew that created the world you will experience.
